

Hello, After reading a report on the proposed changes to the no-call list rules which would allow companies to continue to telemarket consumers who had decided to discontinue doing business with said companies, I would say that since the consumer had decided to discontinue doing business with a company, that means that the consumer is no longer interested in their products or services. If, in the future, the consumer decides to use the telephone equipment that they own, and they are paying for, to re-establish a business relationship with a previous company, that should be up to the consumer. The consumer should not be continually hounded by telemarketers to do business with companies that they've decided to stop doing business with. Please do not allow the 18 month extention. Do not water down the no-call list rules, make them tougher.
